JUDGE THACHER, writing a letter on the steamer Circussia, upon his return from Europe, says:

Whoever crosses the Atlantic with Captain Campbell of the Circassia, will find in him and his officers all the courtesy a passenger can rightfully ask, and when he reaches Glasgow or Edinburg at the Phillip Cockburn ho-tel in either place he will receive a warm welcome and a good home with the proprietors of these places who are respectively the cousin and uncle of our Col. Of course this will greatly benefit the valley in various ways. The major part of the money will be spent among the work-ing men and stores of this section, and with each pienic party from abroad will come a considerable amount of money that eventually will find its way into the coffers of the valley. It is estimated that three hundred thou-sand persons have visited the pienic grounds and the concomitant envinments this season.

The train parted the atmosphere like the projectile from the mouth of a mortar. A short stop was made at Ashley, but scarcely did we appreciate it before the train was again whizzing along its iron pathway. The train labored on up the mountain with a roar, and a shrick, and a rattle, as though endeavoring to free itself from its heavy load of passenger cars. The trip to the Park was successfully made and I found a large crowd associated together and enjoying the freedom of this grandest picnic ground of north-eastern Pennsylvania. The portion of the grounds improved occupies a ter-race-like tract of land on the steep ascent of the mountain. Away to the rear and above it are the forest-clad hills rising in primitive beauty, while at its summit a bold ridge of naked rocks breaks through the soil, with a ragged descent of thirty feet. The legend of the Hermit's Den is very ineresting, it once being the abode of a recluse about whose mysterious presence and manner of life many romantic stories were current half a century ago. A companion visited the Hermit's Cave with me and related its history. Fred C. Johnson, the person alluded to, read a paper before the Wyoming Historical Society some years ago, and the following is the substance of the legend: At the close of the last century there lived alone in the "Den" a man known to all the people of the valley as the "Hermit." He was a man of good address and apparently well educated for that day. There was an air of mystery about all his movements; he at all times avoided rather than sought the society of his follow men when he same down to be fellow-men when be came down into fornia Bestsurant. make purchases, and was civil though reserved in his intercourse with those whistle; and even at night he kept a light or a watchfire burning on this pinnacle, which could be seen from the valley below like a star in the easthermit was working a rich sliver mine somewhere in the mountains and

As sociated with the community of Cenobites at Eprata, en the banks of the Conestogs. And such may have been the case. The venerable Peter Miller, chief of that order, writing about that time, says: "The solitary brethren and sisters lived dispersed in the wilderness, each for himself as hermita, and I, following the same way, set up my hermitage at the foot of a mountain on a limpid spring." This description would seem to answer for this case, if we regard the high cliff as the mountain referred to. Thus attended many a picnic, judging from mountain, and these are the legends as the writer learned them from contemporaries. The last seen of him in these parts he was on his way down the Susquehanna, solitary and alone in a cance, with its bow turned in the direction of the Ephrata colony.
